3. Faculty are encouraged to remove outdated or superseded material and ensure that their files remain manageable in size (no more than two volumes). Close adherence to guidelines set forth in Section 600 is recommended to ensure that reviewers can easily find evidence of performance in appropriate areas.

C. FACULTY COMMITTEES

These recommendations shall be based upon evaluative comparison of each faculty member's qualifications against the standards outlined in the Administrative Manual for retention, tenure, and promotion.

PART II: CRITERIA FOR RETENTION, TENURE AND PROMOTION

Inasmuch as one is to try to ensure consistency of the functions of this Committee and uniformity of standards and criteria among the Departments, it seems advisable to make known to the faculty, in general, and to the departmental committees and Chairs, in particular, the interpretations of Section 600 under which this Committee will operate.

An effort has been made to make these interpretations parallel, insofar as possible, to those already in use within the Departments of the College. In developing these interpretations, we have also tried to make them explicit, short of violating the individual differences inherent in the various disciplines.

Because mere time in rank is not sufficient justification for promotion, two very general principles can be articulated: (1) the pattern of qualifications necessary for recommendation for promotion to each rank must differ from one rank to the next and (2) in considering a given candidate, only those activities subsequent to the candidate's last promotion (or appointment) shall be considered. Prior activities may be considered only insofar as they serve to establish a pattern.

A. Reappointment without tenure.

As long as a candidate, during the first two years, displays professional development in his/her teaching and scholarship, and demonstrates progress towards publishing original research in peer-reviewed journals/books within a candidate's own discipline, reappointment is recommended. For the third and subsequent reappointments, the candidate's eventual tenurability becomes a consideration of increasing importance.

B. Reappointment with tenure.

No faculty member shall be approved for tenure who has not demonstrated potential promotability. Interpretations of criteria for promotion recommendations are discussed below. The final consideration for recommending tenure is the expectation of continued growth.

C. Promotion to Assistant Professor.

The basis for recommending this promotion is described in Section 600.

D. Promotion to Associate Professor

1. Teaching Effectiveness and Direct Instructional Contributions

The candidate must provide evidence to the satisfaction of the Committee of a strong commitment to effective teaching. Evidence of this commitment may include, but is not limited to (1) positive reports from faculty and/or students regarding the candidate's performance in the classroom, (2) research and scholarly activity involving students, (3) participation in curriculum development, and (4) development of innovative teaching methods or improved instructional materials.

2. Research/Scholarship and Publication.

Research/Scholarship and publication are required. The College of Science and Mathematics Personnel Committee recognizes that original research in a science or mathematics specialty is the standard form of scholarly activity in our College and other colleges of science and mathematics around the nation. This requirement will be satisfied by establishing a pattern of publishing original research in peer-reviewed journals/books within a candidate's own discipline. Other scholarly publications may supplement, but cannot substitute for, publications of original research/scholarly activity in peer-reviewed journals. Candidates are expected to seek external funding to support their research.

3. Departmental, College, and University Commitment.
The candidate should make an effort to effectively participate in Departmental, College, and University tasks and should demonstrate initiative and concern for improving and furthering the welfare of the students and of the department.

E. Promotion to Professor

1. Teaching Effectiveness and Direct Instructional Contributions
The pertinent consideration here is whether the candidate has continued to develop as an effective teacher since appointment or most recent evaluation. The same critical evaluation of performance given a candidate for Associate Professor must be made. Moreover, a careful estimate of the likelihood for continued growth must be made.
2. Research/Scholarship and Publication.
Research/Scholarship and publication since the candidate's last promotion (or appointment if the candidate's appointment was an Associate Professor) are required. It is required that candidates will exhibit a pattern of continued growth and contribution to their field of study, as evidenced by the publication of original research in peer-reviewed journals. Other scholarly publications may supplement, but cannot substitute for, publications of original research/scholarly activity in peer-reviewed journals. The original research publications that are expected at the rank of Professor are expected to be substantial contributions. Candidates are encouraged to seek supporting letters from academic or professional colleagues of stature in their field at other institutions that can speak to the quality and impact of the candidate's research publications. Candidates are expected to seek external funding to support their research programs.
3. Service and Leadership.
A candidate for Professor is expected to have served on Department, College and/or University committees. In addition, some other activities may be regarded as service such as (1) paper and textbook refereeing, (2) book reviews, (3) K-12 involvement, (4) chairing sessions at professional societies, (5) invited lectures, (6) editing professional journals, and (7) election to offices in professional societies. Activities 1-7 are some examples of possible service. A candidate for full Professor must demonstrate maturity and judgment in Departmental, College and University affairs. The significance of the candidate's service is to be evaluated.
